The Kadı and the Defiled Bribe

Once in the old days a citizen of this village did something which was offensive to one of his neighbors. They argued about this matter but were unable to settle the matter themselves, and so the offended neighbor took the matter to court

The defendant was an axe maker, and in order to bribe the kad1 to rule in his favor, he gave him an excellent axe. The plaintiff was a farmer, and in an effort to win the case, he bribed the kad1 with the gift of a cow.

During the hearings the defendant tried to remind the kad1 of the bribe he had received from him. He said, "O your honor, give your ruling rapidly and sharply--just as if you were chopping with a good axe."

The kadı thought for a moment, and then he said to the

The kadı was a judge of Moslem canonical law in pre-Republican Turkey. Actually, he ruled on almost any case that came to his court, whether or not the matter at issue turned on canonical or seriat law. How often kadıs accepted bribes is a moot point, but the stereotype of the kadı pictures him as being especially vulnerable to this form of corruption.
