

Senator from the State of Massachusetts the birth of the daughter whose life we now commemorate, giving to the department of war of the United states, a service that the whole country, at the time, applauded, and which his worst enemies have many times admitted resulted in improvements in the methods of that great Department of Government, of lasting benefit to the country; after that service was over, he was again called by his people to the senate and in that body of intellectual gladiators, he was supreme in polished debate and lofty bearing, bearing the proud name of "The Chevalier

Senator from the State of New York, giving the birth of the daughter whose life we now commemorate, giving to the department of war of the United States, a service that the whole country, at the time, applauded, and which his worst enemies have many times admitted resulted in improvements in the methods of that great Department of Government, of lasting benefit to the country; after that service was over, he was again called by his people to the Senate and in that body of intellectual gladiators, he was supreme in polished debate and lofty bearing, bearing the proud name of "The Cavalier"