

Truthfulness.

Every body ought to be truthful and honest, and then they will love one another. If people are not true, they will surely tell lies, steal, and fight together. So it is best to be truthful, and love one another. And school-boys ought to be truthful to their teachers, and not tell lies. If boys tell lies, they will surely grow up to be bad men, and do worse things, and then get shut up in a cell in prison. And then those men will wish that, when they were young they had been good, as they would not then have been put in prison. So truthfulness is of a good deal of use, and every body ought to be truthful.

Edfred Tweed.

Hamden, March 21, 1854.

Truthful news.
No. 6.

W. Harnden, March 21, 1857.

Alfred Ince.