On Over gallops along with typical high lonesome vitality belying a broken hearted lyric. Heartache Town builds through a melodic fragment that rises, step by step, into a ear-worm chorus, this one at a steady medium tempo. Shadowland is another mid-tempo tune as the pair breathe the heartache lyrics passionately while the gorgeous instrumental mix swirls around them. Each word and every note oozes with what country music delivers like no other genre: sad, sad longing and an ache that burdens the soul. This whole album oozes the same emotional pathos as those timeless Orbison classics. Alan Cackett

2-Bit Palomino RIDES AGAIN

Songdog Records

Pure magic, with opulent vocal harmonies,

During the closing years of the noughties, Houston, Texas-based husband and wife duo Peter 'Ren' Renfree and Andrea 'Andi' Renfree, aka The Renfrees, greatly admired the songs of Florida-born six-foot plus, solo singer-songwriter Bill Ward. Based upon a fond childhood memory, the tall and talented guy had composed a song titled 2-Bit Palomino. Making the decision to form a performing/recording trio, they adopted the name. On the strength of their 'must hear' 2010 self-titled debut, the following year 2-Bit Palomino scored the Texas Music Award's Vocal Group of the Year title.

Supported by a number of sidemen on their debut album, the twelve-song folk-country RIDES AGAIN is a stripped back 'this is how we sound live' affair. The sole returnee was Lloyd Maines, whose trademark pedal steel can be heard on two songs, while Bill (vocals, guitar, piano), Andi (vocals, guitar, mandolin, ukulele) and Ren (vocals, percussion, kazoo) furnish every other sound on the disc. On the trio's debut album, the songs were composed individually, together and with others, and, bar two covers, the same formula applies here with Andi once again the principal contributor.

West Virginia-bred musician Tim Henderson arrived in Austin, Texas during the early 1970s just as the city's songwriter scene was exploding. He passed on November 1, 2011, and the trio pays tribute to this fine writer with a cover of his classic Tex-Mex ballad Maria Consuelo, a heartrending tale of love, found and lost. The kazoo makes its sole appearance on the other cover, Tonight You Belong To Me. Penned in 1926, almost three decades elapsed before it enjoyed repeated chart success. Almost an octogenarian, the song has been covered by acts as diverse as The Chipmunks and Eddie Vedder of Pearl Jam. 2-Bit Palomino's rendition is a vocal harmony rich affair.

Ren takes the lead vocal on the melodic opener My Own Backyard, a sprightly tale of travel and true love. Where finger-picked guitars graced the former, Andi's mandolin and voice share the lead on the wistful Me, The Willow And The Wind. From his Y2K solo release SKYLINE (2003), Bill reprises Thunder In My Ear. Tulsa Tempest is a rhythmically funky creation, Lloyd's steel graces the pure country that is Good Morning Teardrops, while this album's centrepiece Church Of The Underground was penned by Andi and Bill. As for Cotton Dress, suffice to say it's a hookladen delight. One of the final engagements of the American Civil War, Ward's Appomattox is a powerhouse treatise on the horrors of war. In The Dream memories of a land that once overflowed with 'milk and honey' merge with the reflection that, in these financially strapped times, products once manufactured at home are now imported from abroad. Continuing in the vein of 'what we've lost,' the closing song queries Where Have All The Heroes Gone? Arthur Wood

Angie Palmer OLD STICKS TO SCARE A BIRD

Akrasia Records: PMCD6

Just as English folk catches up with her, Angie takes another leap forward

Although she still looks like a fresh-faced teenager, Angie Palmer has been in and around the British folk scene for quite a few years now, starting out as a busker and eventually playing every folk club between Lands End and John O'Groats, before basing herself in France when fame and fortune avoided her in her home country. Now with her fifth album, folk music has finally caught up with Angie Palmer as Mumford and Sons,

Ed Sheeran, Noah and the Whale combine the best in Americana with traditional British folk music, to create what is thought of as a 'modern commercial sound,' but is exactly what Angie Palmer has been doing for the last ten years.

OLD STICKS TO SCARE A BIRD starts with the potently political Ballad Of Jack Everyman when Angie barely contains her anger as she tells us your taxes line his pockets and your labour fills his store and he still keeps you poor. It's as good as anything Billy Bragg wrote in his heyday, only with a melody. Raising Hurricanes is a break-up song that combines English folk and blues but sounds like it was written in Louisiana (now do you see why she's difficult to categorise?). Angie Palmer can even do cute—Postcard From Paris is a love song to that great city and it works on every level, especially the blend of guitars, violins, violas and mandolin that give it an ethereal feel.

Traditional folk rears its head on the beautiful Song Of Drowning Sailors, which could have been written any time in the last 100 years, but was written by Angie and Paul Mason for this album, and goes to show what great songwriters they actually are. As usual, I have a favourite track and here it's Dirty Little Secret, which is a funrocking Americana-soaked song, where the title tells you all you need to know.

Haunted By A Stranger is one epic story split into two songs, as the narrator gives us both sides of a fleeting moment in time and the result is astonishing. Speaking of epic, the finale is the eight-minute long Fresco when Angie and her band slide their collective hand inside your chest and gently squeeze your heartstrings, with an arrangement made in heaven by angels.
